Barnet may face Nolan Committee over handling of envv application

THE Nolan Committee into corruption in public life may investigate Barnet's processing of the envv application, after protesters questioned a payment made by Orthodox Jews to the council.

The committee says it may look into the council's handling of the scheme as part of the next stage of its investigations, after being referred by Dr Jeffrey and Elizabeth Segall to a £4,000 cheque the borough received from envv backers the United Synagogue.

While the committee has yet to confirm the subjects of its next inquiries, local authorities are one of two areas likely to be investigated. The handling of planning applications is one of two topics highlighted under the local authority heading.

"If we get similar allegations from Bowdleigh Salterton or Chester as we do from Barnet over planning, then it is quite possible we will look into this issue," said a spokesman for the committee. "But we do deal only with general issues. Individual complaints are not within our remit."

The Segalls, of Chisle Hill, have already pledged to return the payment back to the Orthodox if Barnet does not return the cash, donated in 1991 to fund a feasibility study into the envv.

Barnet rejected the scheme, but was overruled on appeal. Last year, the Overbushman cleared the council of any impropriety in accepting the money. However, Mr and Mrs Segall believe envv donors enables the case to be reconsidered.

The committee have prompted Barnet leader Alan Williams to order a council probe into the payments, which date from before the present Labour and Liberal Democrat administrations.
